THE "WOMAN'S CRUSADE,"

The Movement Generally Attrib uted to Ohio Really Originating in Kentucky.

The Story of the First Organized Movement Against Saloons by Ladies.

And the Causes That [Led Thereto, As Wil nessed by a Sentinel Man "in the Mappy Long Ago."

A party of gentlemen were discussing the 'Woman's Causade' a few days ago, when the origin of the movement was located by one of the parties in the town of Hillsborough, Ohlo, in 1873. Others attributed it to a small town in Illinois, while a Sentinel reporter who was present claimed that the movement originated several years prior to 1873 in the town of Perryville, Kentucky. The latter place is not mentioned in any of the numerous works upon "The Great Temperance Reform," these works generally fixing upon Hillsborough, Ohio, as the place of origin. Whatever distinction may be claimed for the town in question as the place of origin of a movement on the part of woman against saloons, and which created in the respective communities where such movements were inaugurated a measure of excitement that extended far beyond the local borders and casual discussion in the press and the pulpits over the length and breadth of the country, there can be no question but the movement originated four years earlier in the town o erryvi le, Kentucky, which Union and Confederace armies. The causes the saloon and demand that its doors be upon distilled spirits by the General Government indirectly led to the women's movement in Perryville, and ultimately to the conversion of the town into a strong, uncompromising temperance community.

in whisky, which was then worth about twenty-five cents a gallon. Clark's farm was quite small, and the purchase price did not exceed $1,000 or $1,200, and he expecied to go into the saloon business with the whisky as stock in trade. Between the sale of the farm and the time for paying the purchase price, Congress placed a heavy tax on whisky, and the purchaser refused a specific fulfillment of the contract. A suit followed, and the courts held that the contract should be fulfilled according to the price of whisky at the time specified to be delivered, and not at the time the purchase of the farm was made; holding that the seller was entitled to any rise in the price, as he would have been compelled to stand a reduction had the article decreased in value between the time of the contract and the period of fulfillment. The decision of the court made Clark a comparatively rich man, and during the latter days of the war he moved to Perryville, purchased a hotel, and opened a saloon. From this day till his sons had succeeded in squandering his fortune, two years later, the "Hotel de Clark" was the scene of debauchery, fighting, and at least three murders, soon becoming so low that it was shunned by everybody who possessed any self respect or desired the respect of others. In a shooting affair with parties made drunk in the hotel, Clark's son | had. killed two men with the same pistol and some two or three weeks later an unoffending Irishman was killed by a load of buckshot fired at Clark himself by a harness maker with whom he had had a disagreement. Pablic sentiment and want of money to longer continue in business soon drove the Clarks' from the community, but their infamous regime developed a temperance sentiment which became more and more pronounced as time wore on, and the effects of the sale of spirits became manifested in the community.

Soon after the Clarks left, in the winter of 1868-9, the town was incorporated by the Legislature and the act of incorporation also provided that no spirits should be sold within one mile of the corporate limits. For a short time there was no whisky sold openly in the community, but it could be bought in any quantity by the negross, to | world," "No it isn't," said be. "Yes it is." whom it was sold without fear of prosecu- "Then why don't it keep the rain off?" tion, for at this time the colored people were not permitted to testify in the courts. The negroes did not hesitate to tell where whisky could be purchased, and through them as purchasing agents the whites who were disposed to drink were practically supplied with saloon privileges. This state of affairs drifted along for a few months, when one Saturday night in the spring of 1869, three men who were suspected of selling whisky were taken from their houses, escorted to the old gravayard, one of them stretched across a tombstone and soundly thrashed with a stirrup leather. and all ordered away from the town and given ten days in which to leave. Harrodsburg, and proceeded to open a saloon in the heart of the town. As he conducted his business without any effort at concealment it was not a difficult matter to swear out a warrant sgainst him and summon the frequenters of his place to testify against him before the police judge. The warrant was placed in the hands of the marshal, but Johnson publicly announced that an attempt to arrest him would be met with forcible resistance, and for some days he was allowed to buildoze the citizens into an apparent acquiescence in his course. This, however, was only apparent, for hardly a man, woman or child in the community way in sympathy with his defiance of the authorities, not even those who purchased intoxicants at his salcon. For several days the excitement was at fever heat, and nothing else was discussed upon the streets or in the family circle. The nerves of the people were strained to their utmost ten-instead of forcibly entering Johnson's saloon, and demolishing his bar fixtures, as was liberally discussed, a town meeting was called to consider the situation. Men. women and childra ministers of the gospel and old mothers in Israel, left their homes and assembled at one of the churches to canvass the situation in their collective capacity. Dr. J. J. Polk, an old patriarch, presided at the meeting, and much speech making, both from men and women, was indulged in. Some favored the destruction of the saloon property, even at the risk of life and limb, while the more timid thought that the passage of resolutions against Johnson and his business would suffice to show public sentiment, and encourage the officers of the law in the fearless discharge of their duty. A. proposition that they wait upon the saloon keeper with the olive branch instead of the fire brand met with a hearty endorsement and a line was soon formed on the outside of the old church for the purpose of marching two by two to thesaloon. That the demonstration be more effective, the ladies headed the column, themselves being led by the old patriarch who had presided at the meeting, the men bringing up the rear. The scene was, in many respects, an impressive one, as they filed down the long hill in silence, to bear to the saloon keeper the resolutions which the meeting had unanimously in 1862 was the scen. When, during the winter, he heard of the dissection of a dead body in one of our medical colleges, he brooded over the matter a long time. At last, approaching his mother, he said: "When they cut up a man they find the soul, don't they?" "No, dear; the soul leaves the body at death; but even when there, it can not be seen." He thought over this a moment, then exclaimed with dilated eyes: "Why, it must be a kind of
